"On August 24 in the year AD 79 Vesuvius, the top of the mountain was blown off and the cities of Pompeii, Herculaneum, and Stabiae were buried, not by lava, but by ashes and mud. About 2000 people were killed. The mud went westward towards Herculaneum and the ash rained southeast and buried Pompeii, which lay undisturbed beneath the ashes for more than 1500 years. When excavations were started in 1748, it was seen how remarkably preserved everything was. The wet ashes and cinders had formed a hermetic seal about the town, preserving many public structures, temples, theaters, baths, shops, and private dwellings. That same day Herculaneum was buried by mud about 65 ft deep. It is named for the person who, according to legend, founded the city; the mythical Greek Hercules. Like Pompeii it was a popular resort area for wealthy Romans."

"Sodom and Gomorrah, according to the Old Testament (notably Genesis 18, 19), two ancient cities near the Dead Sea. The Bible almost invariably speaks of them together. With Admah, Zeboiim, and Zoar, they formed the five "cities of the plain," all but the last-named of which are said to have been destroyed by a rain of brimstone, perhaps accompanied by an earthquake, because of the wickedness of their inhabitants. Some evidence indicates that they did exist, were destroyed, and that their sites now lie under the Dead Sea. The biblical story of the destruction of the cities is considered by many critics similar to tales found among the Arabs (and other ancient peoples) regarding the sudden disappearance of places; indeed, Lot, who in the biblical story survives the destruction, figures prominently in the Qur'an (Koran). Those who deny the literal accuracy of the narrative contend that the desolate character of the land around the Dead Sea, which is fatal to plant and animal life, would naturally suggest the thought of some catastrophe."

"Eisenman's architecture appears to be a product of accepted nihilism, his suppressed realization of an irreparable estrangement from absolute truth, and thereby paralleling the themes grounded in the later works of Nietzsche. Eisenman's architecture makes an attempt to undermine the goal-oriented man (reason as ends and means) by creating an architecture born out of pure process. His concept of the "futureless present" fortifies his fascination with a design process that denies the attainment of any goal in so far as it relates to the future. Eisenman develops an architecture devoid of consistent meaning. It is the result of a decentering process; that is, the full knowledge of the loss of common truth results in the superimposition of substitute truths which constantly and consistently deconstruct themselves. Hence, his architecture results in the recording of this critical process. Furthermore, the architecture of Eisenman could be reinterpreted in Nietzschean terms as a process of self over- coming, since the only goal of his architecture is to analyze itself constantly and critically. Just as Nietzsche placed all value in the action of life fulfilled through the will to power, Eisenman expresses this in his architecture. The value or significance of Eisenman's architecture is projected internally to the procedure of decomposition."

— 02 — (26 MARKAH) 0005 reading 10 in mal

Men can have no power over the world but that which is given by the law of God. In unnumbered fables we have seen the world described as being the creation of God, and we have also seen the creation of the world by the hand of man. In the former case, the creation is described as being the work of God, and in the latter case, it is described as being the work of man. In both cases, the creation is described as being the work of God, and in both cases, the creation is described as being the work of man. In both cases, the creation is described as being the work of God, and in both cases, the creation is described as being the work of man. In both cases, the creation is described as being the work of God, and in both cases, the creation is described as being the work of man.
